

Eurasian Regional Integration and Economic Cooperation: Mongolia's Opportunity for Participation (Summary)

SOYOLGEREL Nyamjav

Senior Researcher, Institute for Strategic Studies (ISS), Mongolia

In recent years, countries in the Eurasian region have been aiming to expand their economic growth by forming cooperative transportation and network infrastructure. Agendas such as free trade agreements, transportation and mega energy projects among countries and third neighbors are examples of this progress/process. As these agendas come into action, it would bring economic growth and development, and the opportunity to compete within the market for the countries in the region. This research does not concentrate on the competition among states for gaining advantage in the geostrategic sphere and for securing the reliable energy and natural resources that would be critical for economic growth. Instead, this paper aims to illustrate Mongolia's opportunity to participate in regional integration processes and economic cooperation to support economic development.